Why do children play longer with LEGO than with other toys?

Most toys are designed by adults. They often have a strong appeal for children at first but soon pall and are put aside. They are literally "played out", i.e. all their possibilities have been explored and exhausted. Every toy cupboard is full of such expensive discards.

LEGO is different. In the first place children use the bricks to build what they want. Just the way they want it. Not once but a thousand times over. The bricks are so simple to build with that a very young child can use them, yet so versatile that older children (yes, and adults too!) still find them ideal for giving shape to their ideas.

LEGO bricks are a creative play material. They offer as much scope to the growing imagination of boys and girls as those other great classics of childhood, like sand and water and paints and dressing-up and let's-pretend.

The imagination is boundless. The need to make things is fundamental. That is why children play with LEGO longer than with other toys. Because LEGO is a new toy every day.

For toddlers from 1½ years.

Easy building for girls and boys from 3 years.

For girls and boys who already have some experience of LEGO.

For girls and boys who are really familiar with LEGO building.

Look for these symbols on the LEGO boxes and in this leaflet to guide you to the best boxes for your child's stage of development.

Start with the big LEGO Nursery Bricks from 18 months

A

Toddlers love the big, bright LEGO Nursery Bricks. They bang them together, pile them, shunt them. Then one day two clip together! Constructive play has begun. Not models yet, but they will come later. By about 3 years the child will be ready for standard LEGO bricks, only half the size of Nursery Bricks, yet the two fit each other! So these first bricks will still be in use long after most other nursery toys are put aside.
